THE STORY OF THE WAR.

THIS greatest war in history, and the greatest crime, began on June 28, 1914, when the Archduke Franz Ferdinand, nephew and heir of Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, was assassinated at Sarajevo. Most of us vaguely knew that Power, instigated by Germany, sowed on the tragedy as the pretext for beginning a long-considered war. Serbia was to be taught a lesson, and Germany, the master-workshop was to extend its empire to the Rhine. Immediately after the murder the Austrian Press declared that they were actually plotted by high officials in Berlin, notwithstanding the fact that the Serbian Government had called a conference to the government of the assassins in Hungary and advised his deportation. Austria, after a month's sparing for time to enable Germany to complete her preparations, dispatched a Note to Serbia on July 25, requiring the release of the assassins, the cessation of all Serbian propaganda in the Dual Monarchy, and insisting that an investigation into the assassinations should be conducted on Serbian soil with the assistance of Austrian officials. Serbia reluctantly refused. Russia decided that she would permit no trifling in the Balkans, and on July 28 Austria, having refused England's suggestion of a conference, declared war on Serbia, and began the hostilities which were to plunge the world in a vortex of blood. France took up the cudgels, Germany declared war on France and France, and Great Britain, refusing to tolerate the invasion of neutral Belgium and to contemplate the harrowing of the French coast, declared war on Germany at eleven p.m. on August 4, 1914.

THE CALL OF THE MOTHERLAND.

The war spread like prairie fire across Western Europe. Huge German armies bore down towards Paris, taking the greater part of Belgium on their way, and destroying some of its greatest treasures, and for a time it appeared as though nothing could stop them. But Sir John French, in command of the "Old Contingent," and the French Army, under General Joffre, offered a sturdy resistance at the Battle of the Marne, and eventually brought the enemy movement to a stand, which proved to be the great turning point of the war.

England rose in her might, and at the call of Lord Kitchener, thousands flocked to the colours, were trained, and rapidly drafted out to France. It was soon seen that the war would last many years, and each side prepared itself accordingly. Trench warfare became the order of the day, and the trenches extended in a long line through Belgium, the north-east corner of France, into Lorraine and Alsace, and even to the Swiss frontier. During 1915 the relative position of the armies altered little from that taken up after the battle of the Marne and the fighting in the Aisne valley, but one must specially mention the capture of Neuve Chapelle in March, the two battles of Ypres (in the second of which the Germans introduced poison gas), the heavy campaigning in the Argonne, the continued bombardment of Remberc, and the great French offensive in Champagne. The battle of Loos, in September, when the British, under Sir Douglas Haig, achieved a distinct victory over the Germans, was the high-water mark of the fighting. During the winter of 1915-16 the campaign died down. In the latter year the tide of success distinctly ebbed away from Germany. The British Army grew under the command of General French; Sir Douglas Haig had succeeded Sir John French as commander-in-chief; Italy and Romania came into the theatre on the side of the Allies; and the efforts of all were co-ordinated; and Germany was of the Allies on every front. After a fierce artillery attack on July 1, the British smashed an onslaught on the Somme in the Arras sector the British smashed an onslaught on the Somme ridge, and repulsed an attempt towards Albert. In Flanders the Germans, under the Cesar Pilsudski, launched their great and costly offensive against Verdun, but after three months' fighting they had to acknowledge that the fortress was impregnable; and simultaneously occurred an equally bold effort for the position of Dommartin and Vaux. On July 1 began the great Franco-British offensive on both sides of the Somme, on a front twenty-five miles long. At the end of ten days' fighting Sir Douglas Haig was able to announce the capture of the first system of German defences and magazines the French, under General Foch, made still larger conquests of territory. The second phase of the battle opened on July 14, and continued for more than two months, during which "tanks" were employed for the first time. Sir Douglas Haig was able to report the result of the last drawn-out battle to be—of the 200,000 prisoners, the engagement with thirty-eight German divisions, of which twenty-nine had been withdrawn broken and exhausted; the seizure of the Acre upland, and the retirement of the enemy to the Bagdad-Treacy line. It was a matter of general regret that the death by drowning of Lord Kitchener, while on his way to Russia, prevented his witnessing the triumphs of the British arms, so largely due to his organising genius and statesmanlike foresight.

THE WORLD AGAINST GERMANY.

The year 1917 found Germany unbeaten, but with all the world ranged against her. The United States, after long deliberation, had accepted the challenge thrown out by the sinking of the Lusitania, and entered the lists strongly aggressive, while in her wake came the less active republics of Venezuela, the neutrals of the Isthmus, King Constantine, and ranged herself up with the Allies, and China and Siam followed the example of Japan in practical protest against German world power. Amid all the changing fortunes in the various theatres of war the outstanding feature was the relentless and increasing pressure on the Western Front. There was a great joint advance on the south-western angle of the line in the spring, when the enemy retired to the new "Hindenburg" positions; and thence the fighting passed northward and westward, each phase adding a new star of lustre to French and British military glory. By the successive captures of the Vimy Ridge in April, Messines Ridge in June, and the greater part of the Passchendaele Ridge in November, the Allies obtained the mastery of all outstanding positions, and were able to feel that victory, however long delayed, was secure. The Hindenburg line in front of Cambrai was breached by a surprise victory by General Byng on November 21. The French, having beaten the attack on Verdun to a standstill, unsuccessfully assaulted the fortified lines north of the Aisne in April, but renewed the attack in October, and were able to bring the famous ridge above the Chemin des Dames, which had been one of the chief symbols of the German advance, into open country in many military conferences; and on November 12 Mr. Lloyd George, who had succeeded Mr. Asquith as Prime Minister, announced in Paris the establishment of a Supreme War Council, to sit permanently at Versailles.

THE WAR LORD NURS FOR PEACE AND ABDICATION.

The Germans lay low during the winter of 1917-18, reserving their strength for what had proved fatal for victory. On March 22 they crossed the Aisne, having come fifty miles from between the Somme and the Oise. Three days later Foch had fallen; by the 23rd the Germans had reached their original line of July, 1916, and Neuve-Chapelle fell to their arms. It was perhaps the blackest moment of the war, when nearly four years fighting had seemed as good as wasted, and when the Allies were near to taking the position they originally contemplated, of being in possession of the Chateau ports and able to dominate the shores of Britain. But the Allies rallied themselves with a mighty effort. A military service Bill, raising the age to fifty-one, was passed by Parliament; General Foch was made Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Armies; and by the beginning of June it was announced that the German advance had been checked. The third great German attack on a fifty-mile front before Rheims proved a failure; and thenceforward the Allies achieved a remarkable series of victories, which one greater effort involving the German armies or compelling their retreat from France and Belgium—Hail east of Amiens, lying north of the Aisne, the French lower down the line, and the Americans, under General Pershing, flattening out the St. Mihiel salient. The enemy was forced backwards at every point. Plan-d'Amour, the last German counter-wedge was driven into the German lines at Sedan, and along the whole 800 miles, from Ostend to Switzerland, the situation became so desperate and precarious that the Kaiser, with military disaster in front and naval mutiny and social revolution at home, asked for an armistice on October 6. Bavaria was proclaimed a Republic, the Duke of Brunswick renounced his throne, and payment was suspended by the Berlin banks.

The Supreme War Lord became a miserable supplicant for peace, and on November 9 he and the Crown Prince, the equal co-partner of his guilt, abdicated.

THE BATTLE OF JUTLAND.

At this point it may be advisable to discuss the naval operations in the great war. On the outbreak of hostilities the greater part of the British Fleet, which had been assembled in the Channel, had been hurried into the North Sea, where they offered an effectual bar to German naval operations. In fact, nearly all the enemy warships were bottled up in the Kiel Canal, with the Baltic as a convenient backwater. Early in November a battle was fought off the coast of Chile, in which the Good Hope and the Monmouth were sunk, and Admiral Cradock lost his life; but that disaster was promptly retrieved on December 8, when Admiral Sturdee met the German commander, Admiral von Spee off the Falkland Isles and annihilated his force. Thenceforward German naval operations outside the North Sea were confined to commerce raiders such as the Emden and the Ariete, but even these were laid by the heels at last. Early in 1915 a battle in the North Sea resulted in the sinking of the Blucher, six months later the Konigsberg, which had taken shelter in the Elbe River, was destroyed by British monitors; and on May 31, 1916, was fought the great naval victory off Jutland, in which the British, under Admiral Jellicoe, lost three battle cruisers, three cruisers, and eight destroyers, and the enemy suffered the loss of eighteen ships. It was the last great attempt of the German to defy the sea-power of Britain, although it is now known that the stage was set for a naval battle as late as November, but the German sailors refused to come out! The British Navy, if silent, was ever watchful, and to its vigilance we owe the success of the blockade, which brought Germany perilously near starvation, the safeguard of our food supplies from the ends of the earth, and the convoying of thousands of American troops across the Atlantic. One has only to mention the naval raid on Ostend and Zeebrugge, and the sinking of the Vindictive in Ostend Harbour to show that the fighting spirit remained the same as in Nelson's day.

DOING OUR BIT AT HOME.

The British Navy and the British Army had a splendid tracking at home. The principle of conscription was accepted until an army of seven millions had been raised; munition works and aeroplane factories sprang up like Aladdin's palace in the night until the country became one vast arsenal; we cheerfully accepted the rationing system, and, was soon of a thousand millions, and an incessant tax of five per cent. was levied to meet the cost of war; men were sprung to service at munition making, on the railway, in the Post Office, in trams, and in omnibuses, or on the land, indeed at every point where they could release a man for the Army.

OPERATIONS IN AFRICA.

It was a painful surprise to Germans when Great Britain, in defiance of Belgium and her obligations to France, entered the war; it was far more painful when the Overseas Dominions rallied in their thousands to the help of the Motherland. We have spoken of their gallant achievements on the Western Front and in Gallipoli, but farther afield they acquitted themselves in splendid fashion. The seizure of German M. Guinea by Gordon Bennett destroyed two dagger spots in far waters; while in Africa the soldiers of the Commonwealth strove gallantly in breaking down German influence in the Dark Continent. General Botha, having stamped out the rebellion led by De Wet and Beyers, proceeded on his campaign southwards with West Africa. After enormous difficulties owing to the arid nature of the country, Windhuk, the German capital, was occupied on May 15, 1915, and on July 11 the German commander signed terms of unconditional surrender. Allied British, French and Belgian forces completed the conquest of the Cameroons by New Year's Day, 1916. A more difficult task lay before General Botha in the conquest of East Africa, where the Germans were said to command 2000 white and 14,000 native soldiers, well supplied with artillery. The Portuguese assisted by operating from their own territory, and the Belgians pressed forward from the Congo. Harried from one place to another, beset by disease and shortness of supplies, the enemy gradually collapsed, and with the surrender of Deutsches-Salambo on September 4 his power was finally broken.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

NO Prime Minister in this country ever had such a dazzling career as Mr. Lloyd George. He is a man of the people, and his sensational rise from his humble lot in a Welsh shoemaker's cottage to the position of greatest power in the mightiest Empire the world has ever seen is a triumph of character over circumstances. The law was his chosen profession, but politics were his passion. Long before he held office in any Government he was a power in the land. Risen from the ranks, he has intense sympathy for the poor and the workers of the country, and the inspiration of his life-work has been a passionate desire to improve the conditions under which they live. A notable part of his Celtic inheritance is the noble gift of oration, and his speeches, marvellously compact of flashing wit, impressive imagery and indomitable determination, have thrilled the whole nation and given him a place in the British heart during the war as the speaker of no other man's statement have done. He has the resistless energy and driving force which gets things done, the magnetic personality which attracts, and the faculty of judging men which enabled him to call to his aid, in the great task for which he was singled out, the best brains in the Empire. His triumphant record as War Prime Minister marked him out as the one man to lead the nation through the difficult paths of reconstruction, and to lay well and truly the foundations of a new and better world. The people regard him with affection and confidence as their own man, and they have trusted him with the greatest Parliamentary majority ever given to a Prime Minister.

PEACE SOUVENIR.

RUSSIA AND AUSTRIA.

Russia, as we have shown, was one of the first of the Powers to accept the challenge of the Hun and his Austrian ally. The Grand Duke Nicholas massed his armies against Austrian Poland, at the same time holding out hopes of independence to the Polish people. Lemberg was taken, after a fierce day's battle, and a general advance made on Przemysl, while an attempt was made to force the passes of the Carpathians, and thus having broken down the Austro-Russian party overran Transylvania. German forces under von Hindenburg—who assumed supreme control—came to the relief of the situation, but at Augustow they were partially overthrown. The tide of battle swept Russians, Germans and Austrians over wide tracts of territory from the Carpathians to the Baltic, and with the fall of Przemysl on March 18th, after six months' siege, the Russians seemed to have established their supremacy over the Austrians. Early in the following month they claimed to be in possession of all the Carpathian summits. Heavy reinforcements of Germans were under von Mackensen, able to exert pressure in Western Galicia, until on June 3 the German-Austrians had re-captured the great San Fortress and were pressing towards Lemberg, which was occupied on June 22. The drive through Galicia and Poland continued during the summer months, but as the Russian armies swept forward in the north for a gigantic envelopment of the Russians, General Alexieff, who had succeeded the Grand Duke Nicholas, won a series of brilliant victories along the Strypa River. The enemy had seized a great deal of territory, but it had failed in its main purpose to put Russia out of the war. New demonstrations against Galicia resulted in the seizure of Stanislau, and pressed in front and on both flanks Count Botha had no alternative but to withdraw the Austrian troops, after losing 300,000 men in ten weeks' fighting.

MURDER OF THE TSAR.

From the first it had been recognised that Russia must attempt to relieve the pressure on the British and French forces in the West by an invasion of East Prussia, and during the first year of the war huge German and Russian armies swayed over the frontier. Fresh offensives were developed, the plan of Hindenburg being to effect an enveloping movement on a vast scale by pressing on Warsaw on all sides. It was the final fall of the Narwek and the Bionic fortifications in July, 1915, which sealed the fate of the city. Prince Leopold of Bavaria entering on August 4, Novo Gospicew fell a fortnight later, and under pressure of fresh German armies the Grand Duke Nicholas continued his withdrawal into Russia, the culmination coming on August 25 with the evacuation of Brest-Litovsk. The German movement through the Balkan provinces, which depended on the capture of Riga as not so successful, for a signal victory by the Russian Fleet drove the Germans from the neighbourhood of the port, and confined the offensive to the land side. Fossed at Vilna, the German attack dwindled during the winter. Just when in the following year the French were resisting the enemy attack on Verdun, the Russians, under General Brusiloff, struck their first real blow by an offensive along the entire front south of the Prusso marshes to the Romanian frontier. By the end of June Bukovina was entirely Russian, and at the close of ten weeks' fighting the enemy had suffered such a defeat that the Archduke Frederick was relieved of his post. But there was a draw-back to the Russian army, which worked with disastrous effect during the winter of 1916-17. The civilian population had suffered enormous privations, the Russian troops had been sent to battle unarmed and unfed, and the demands for representative government had been presented to the Emperor, swayed as he was by the pro-German Empress and the notorious monk Rasputin. In December, 1916, Rasputin was murdered, on March 11 of the following year the Emperor abdicated, and was subsequently murdered, while the fate of the Empress is unknown. Kerensky failed to control the revolutionary storm, and Russia, under Lenin and Trotsky, passed into a welter of Bolshevism, which has not yet always shown to a deficiency for. Romania, after putting up a stout fight, had to yield under the Treaty of Bucharest, Montenegro was beaten out of the field, and the Austrians became established in northern Albania—two successes which led the now strengthened Dual Monarchy to essay an offensive in Trentino. It began in May, 1916, and before the end of the month our Ally had been forced to evacuate Asiago, and in August the Italians were able to claim the capture of Gorizia, and were making a rapid advance on the Carnic. In May, 1917, the Austrians returned to the attack on Italy, and with varying fortune the fighting was the most strenuous, however, until in October the great counter stroke, in which the Germans were also engaged, fell with dramatic swiftness. The Italian Armies were forced to retreat to the line of the Piave. Great Britain and France passed troops on to the assistance of our Ally, but many months were to elapse before the Italians were able to take their revenge for Caporetto by sweeping the Austrians across the Piave and inflicting on them a disastrous defeat.

AUSTRIA ASK FOR PEACE.

Austria, except when she had been aided by Germany, had put up a poor fight everywhere, and her success was further imperilled by conditions of affairs at home. Frequent changes of Ministers were poor remedies against foolishness and labour troubles. The Emperor Francis Joseph might have held his gamashak, but his death in November, 1916, vacated the throne in favour of the Emperor Karl, who was soon to be deposed by the power of popular vote. As the food problem in Austria became acute the talk of political liberty for the various races in the Dual Empire was louder, and the military operations on the Italian Front became of secondary importance to the need of procuring internal and, if possible, external peace. The efforts of Prince Sixte of Bourbon proved a failure; Count Herlitz and Count Czernin, who approached President Wilson, were informed by him that no general peace could be obtained by separate negotiations; but Austria still persisted. The Czechoslovaks were accepted as a separate nation by the Allies; the Croatians recognised themselves; Bohemia, it was promised, was to be divided into national districts. A second peace Note, published in September, evoked a reply from President Wilson that America "can and will entertain no proposal for a conference upon a matter concerning which it has made its position and purpose so plain"; and on October 27 Austria-Hungary, following the example of King Ferdinand of Bulgaria, definitely asked for peace.

MARSHAL FOCH.

MILITARY genius is a quality which has been claimed for several commanders during the war with more or less justice, but there is one man to whom it may be attributed without fear of contradiction. That man is Marshal Foch, who was appointed Generalissimo of the Allied Armies a few days after the opening of the great German offensive in March last year. Ferdinand Foch has been a student of the science of war all his life; he taught it in French military academies, and expounded his theories in brilliant books which are world-famous. When the war came he had the chance to put his theories into practice. There may have been people who looked to see him fail, as theories have failed before the test of reality. But Foch did not fail. He succeeded magnificently. He had much to do with the Battle of the Marne, where strategists contend that the war was really won, though four years of fighting followed. Other successes followed. No slight failure tarnished the lustre of his reputation. He became Commander-in-Chief of the French Armies, and then, when unity of command was hailed as The Man. He took the command at the most critical moment in the war for the Allies, but he saw victory clearly. He had the calm confidence of the man who knows. When the prospects of the Allies seemed to be at their darkest he could say rightly, "I am sorry for Ludendorff." He bided his time, and at the right moment launched his blow, and blow upon blow. Soon the military power of Germany was destroyed by the greatest soldier since Napoleon.

GALLIPOLI.

When the war cloud burst over Europe in August, 1914, Turkey was at first undecided as to her course, but the Sultan Mahomed, avaricious between German agents and the Young Turk Party, led by Enver Pasha, decided to support Germany. She gave shelter to the German cruisers Goeben and Breslau, and even used them in shelling the Greek coast. The Russians, who had been preparing themselves for Odessa, on November 5 Great Britain declared war on Turkey and annexed Cyprus; a British force occupied Fao on the Persian Gulf, and the Russians invaded Asia Minor from the Caucasus. The campaign against Turkey was in three parts: the attack on the Dardanelles, the expedition to Mesopotamia, and the preservation of Egypt and the advance through Palestine to Aleppo, the object of all being to break through the "Scherme" along which the German Emperor desired to pass in his conquest of the East. The closing of the Dardanelles had stopped the exportation of wheat from Russia, and the importation of arms from Aix, and the British Government determined that the formidable Straits should be opened. It was a brilliant conception, but less brilliantly carried out. Early in 1915 the Queen Elizabeth bombarded Chanak, but an attempt to force the Narrows led to the loss of the Invincible, the Ocean and the Houset. The Australian and New Zealand Forces landed at Anzac Cove; another landing was made at Suvla Bay; and many other desperate attempts were made to seize the Dardanelles and the Straits; but all efforts were in vain against the Germanised Turkish forces and the guns, entrenchments, and barbed-wire by which they had made the place impregnable. Our troops, on the advice of Lord Kitchener, who had personally visited the spot, were withdrawn, and Constantinople was left undisturbed save from an occasional aeroplane or submarine. The score for Turkey was, however, discounted by heavy losses in Armenia. A lightning campaign by the Romanians in February, 1916, led to the capitulation of Erzerum, and two months later to the capture of the great port of Trebizond. Erzerum, 300 miles west of Erzurum, was in Russian hands by the end of July, and in the following month the Russian position south of Lake Van had been consolidated.

THE COLLAPSE OF TURKEY.

Towards the end of 1914 the British took possession of Baiau at the head of the Persian Gulf, and by a series of brilliant attacks the Turks were driven back along the Tigris and the Euphrates. On September 28, 1915, Kut-el-Amara fell to the British, and the battle of Ctesiphon on November 22 brought

SIR DOUGLAS HAIG.

"HAIK'S the man!" said the knowing ones when the war began; and "Haik's the man" it proved, as he ended in a glorious victory for the British and Allied troops. He was born in 1861, a member of a famous Fife family, who have been men of fighting men for long generations. Sir Douglas joined the 7th Hussars in 1885. His first war service was in the Sudan in 1896. In the South African war he earned a name as a cavalry leader, and was in the battle of Elslandslaagte, the operations round Colenso, at Paardeberg, and the relief of Kimberley. He was Chief of Staff from 1899 to 1902 in India, then was transferred to the Aldershot command. His advancement was won by work. He proved his mettle in the early days of the war. Sir John French's despatches on the great retreat of "The Old Contemptibles" record "the skilled manner in which Sir Douglas Haig extricated his corps from an exceptionally difficult position in the darkness of the night" from Marville. He has that gift of incalculable value to a leader of men—perpetual coolness. In the immortal October battle at Ypres a German shell struck Sir Douglas Haig's headquarters, burst inside the house, and killed or wounded everyone on the staff except the Field-Marshal himself, who was thrown down and remained unconscious over an hour. When he recovered he refused to go to hospital, and, dazed and staggering, yet helped Sir John French to make new dispositions and roll the Germans back to Gheluvelt. In the critical period of the terrific drive at him by an enemy with vastly greater numbers and artillery, he said again and again, "God alone can save us." But his iron nerve never failed, them within striking distance of Baghdad. Turkish reinforcements drove back the expedition, and after five months' siege at Kut the gallant Townshend was compelled to surrender. The operations of the relief force were hampered and mired, and a breakdown in transport and medical services which raised the country in a form of siege. But while Turkey was preparing herself on Gallipoli and Mesopotamia, another blow was preparing. At the end of 1916 General Maude took up a decisive offensive towards Baghdad, capturing Basra at once (October 27), and on March 11 was able to hold the British flag over the city of Harran-al-Rashid. The Turkish power in Mesopotamia was broken. In Syria the Turks had attempted the capture of the Suez Canal, and had suffered a stinging lesson of the Semitic tribes on the western frontier, so that a stern lesson became necessary. Sir Archibald Murray decided to advance to the Palestine frontier. Rafa was stormed and captured, but the battle near Gaza, fought on March 23, 1917, was indecisive, and it was not until October that General Allenby, who had taken command, was able to capture Beersheba. The Australian and New Zealand troops occupied Jaffa, on December 9 Jerusalem was captured, and thenceforward the campaign pursued an even course until Jericho, Damascus, and Aleppo were taken, and General Allenby was able to announce that the Seventh and Eighth Turkish armies had practically ceased to exist. A few days earlier Bulgaria had asked for peace; and Turkey, with Palestine and Syria lost, with her hopes in Egypt shattered, with the way open to attack through Bulgaria, and with all help from Germany cut off, pleaded for and obtained an armistice.

GERMAN ATROCITIES.

It was Bismarck's boast that Germany's enemies should have nothing left but their eyes to weep with, and during the long drawn out war the Kaiser, inspired by the Crown Prince, von Tirpitz and Hindenburg, had pursued the policy of ruthlessness. German warships bombarded such "fortified" places as Scarborough, Whitby, Lowestoft and Margate. German submarines, pursuing a policy of frightfulness, torpedoed the Lusitania and many another harmless merchant vessel, and did not hesitate to sink the Llandover Castle and other hospital ships. Even the survivors, as they struggled in the water, were shot or else, as in the case of the Belgian Prince, were taken on board the submarine, which then submerged while they were left to drown. Their policy was to "sink at sight" and "leave no trace." Nurse Cavell was executed for aiding British and French prisoners to escape; Captain Fryatt, for attempting to ram a U-boat met with the same fate. Prisoners of war were condemned to the hardest labour on a starvation diet of food, and girls by the thousand were deported from the occupied parts of Belgium and France to serve as slaves behind the German lines, or to minister to the baseness which has characterised German officers since the war began. The full tale of horrors in this respect cannot be printed. By the side of these atrocities the razing of chateaux, the smashing of lace machinery at Cambrai, the cutting down of fruit trees, and the destruction of the Library of Leiden or the Town Hall of Arras, are almost acts of virtue. German Zeppelins and aeroplanes German aeroplanes bombed London and Paris, and many defenceless towns, night after night, with the loss of hundreds of innocent lives; and German hypocrites protested loudly on the score of "humanity" when Allied airmen attacked the poison factories of Mannheim. Is it any wonder that, as these evils grew in intensity and volume, as the true nature of German kultur was revealed, the civilised nations of the earth banded together for the destruction of this menace to civilisation. The task was long and arduous; it involved the sacrifice of millions of lives and millions of treasure, but it was well worth doing, that the world might be safe for humanity and civilisation.

GERMANY'S DOWNFALL.

Following on the armistice, which meant practically the surrender of the German land forces to Marshal Foch and Sir Douglas Haig, came the surrender of the much-vaunted German fleet. They came "not in single ships but in battalions" to the Firth of Forth, where in silence and disdain they were received by Admiral Beatty. Five hundred miles down the coast, at Harwich, the U-boats, on which the enemy had relied to starve us into submission, were given up without the show of a fight. It was a complete collapse of the mighty Empire which was going to make the whole world bow the knee to Kaiser and the German Emperor. Was Lord no more, fled for refuge to Holland, knowing that his power was broken for ever. Various republics were set up in the Fatherland, so that it became difficult for the delegates of the Peace Conference to know with whom they had to treat, but they made it clear that, whatever happened to Germany, she would not be allowed to escape the penalties of her misdeeds as a united Empire or to become again the menace to Europe, which she had been for nearly a generation.

THE FATE OF THE MONARCHS.

The war caused a great mortality among monarchs. Death claimed the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. Constantine of Greece was deposed by the Allies, who placed his second son on the throne in his stead. The Sultan of Turkey, the helpless dupe of the Kaiser and German intriguers, died last year. King Ferdinand of Bulgaria abdicated. The Emperor Karl of Austria did the same. The Kaiser fled from Germany to Holland, and the Crown Prince found a refuge in the same country. The darkest and grimmest fate of all was that of the ex-Tsar of Russia, who had been hurled from his throne by the Revolution. After being kept prisoners for many months, he and the Tsarina, the Tsarevitch and his sisters were brutally murdered.

PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Peace Conference in Paris occupied many weeks of serious deliberation, and it was not until the afternoon of Wednesday, May 7th, that the preliminary terms of peace were agreed to by German delegates at Versailles. The historic scene took place in the great dining room of the Trianon Palace Hotel, on the fourth anniversary of the sinking of the "Lusitania." Places were reserved for 65 Allied delegates and seven Germans. The centre seat at the head of the table was reserved for M. Clemenceau; on his left were Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Barnes, and Sir Joseph Ward, and on his right were President Wilson, Mr. Lansing, Mr. Henry White, Colonel House and General Bliss. A few minutes after 3 o'clock the German delegates, headed by Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, filed into the room in single file, bowed, and took their places at the table reserved for them, facing M. Clemenceau and the American and British delegations. All were sombrely garbed in black morning coats, with dark neckties. Count Brockdorff-Rantzau sat at the centre of the table, having on his right Dr. Landsberg, Herr Giesbertz, and Herr Leinert, and on his left Professor Schneck and Dr. Karl Melchior. The secretaries and the interpreter of the German delegates were seated at a smaller table behind their chiefs.

M. CLEMENCEAU LAYS DOWN THE TERMS.

Directly the Germans had taken their seat, M. Clemenceau rose. His speech was addressed directly to the German delegates, and every word of it penetrated to every ear in the room. He was followed by the interpreter for English, Lieutenant Montaux, and then by the interpreter for German. Every word spoken during the afternoon, whether French, English or German, was translated into the other two languages. The dramatic moment came when M. Dubaut entered the square of tables and presented the Peace Treaty, composed in a bulky khaki-clad volume, to Count Brockdorff Rantzau, who received it with a low bow.

COUNT BROCKDORFF-RANTZAU'S REPLY.

Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, who had assumed a pair of tortoise-shell rimmed spectacles and produced a pile of documents from a case, suddenly raised his voice in German. He was claiming the right which the French Prime Minister had promised to any delegate who wished to do so to reply to M. Clemenceau's pronouncement. Count Brockdorff-Rantzau rapped out his oration sentence by sentence, pausing after each one to allow first the French and then the English interpreter to translate what he had said. He read his speech sitting down. In places it seemed almost treacherous, in others it was vague and verbose, and in none did it give satisfaction to the audience, composed of men who had guided Germany's enemies through the war, and few of whom cared to listen to admissions of guilt by the German people which, in the main, sought to minimise the guilt of the Germans by the simple process of charging their adversaries with the same offence. The Coast was not happy in his plea for his countrymen; he was still less so in his English speaking interpreter. After his first sentence had been translated, M. Clemenceau called on him to speak. The interpreter made another effort, which twice called forth another sharp command from the Chairman, coupled with a plain intimation that if he meant to act in that room as an interpreter he must make his interpretations audible to everyone present. Thus adjured, the unfortunate official raised his voice and translated the remainder of Count Brockdorff-Rantzau's speech in a kind of shout with a strong German-American accent and a rasp in his overstrained voice which set every ear in the room on edge.

No answer was made on the part of the Allies to Count Brockdorff-Rantzau's attempt to justify his country. As soon as he had finished speaking and the interpreter had translated his last sentence across the room in French and English, M. Clemenceau, in a single sentence, declared the business of the day discharged and the sitting at an end. It had lasted a full hour, of which forty minutes were taken up by Count Brockdorff-Rantzau and his interpreters.

SIGNING THE TREATY OF PEACE.

The Germans at home, when the terms of the Treaty were communicated to them, were furious with indignation, but the Allied Powers made it plain that the Treaty must be accepted. Several weeks were spent in fruitless protest, and then, shortly after three o'clock on the afternoon of Saturday, June 28th, 1919, the Treaty of Peace was signed in the Hall of Mirrors at Versailles, almost on the spot where the German Empire had been proclaimed forty-eight years earlier. There were no speeches, no reading of documents; M. Clemenceau merely handed the German delegates a document that the Treaty he had signed was a copy of that which had already been presented to them. The signatories for Great Britain were Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, Lord Milner, and Mr. Barnes. In addition, the British Empire was represented by two signatures each for Canada, Australia, South Africa and India, and one for New Zealand. Five delegates each signed for France, Italy and Japan, and three for Belgium. Immediately on the signing of the treaty the great event was notified by the bombing of balloons and wireless messages from the Giffs Tower flashed the glad tidings all over the world. Peace, long desired, had come at last.

SIR DAVID BEATTY.

THE name of Sir David Beatty is known wherever the British flag flies over the wide seas of the world. Ever since the war began he has distinguished himself, first at the Battle of Heligoland, then at the Battle of Jutland. Then came the supreme triumph, when he stood on his flagship and accepted the surrender of the German Fleet! Sir David combines the two qualities, courage and dash, with the sanity and balance of a singularly strong character. Those who know him say that in an emergency he might be attacked with the partial blindness which on one occasion came to Nelson. That is beside the point, however, and we know from Admiral Beatty's early life in the Navy that recklessness in the face of danger and bulldog tenacity and grit got him promotion on one occasion after another. Admiral Beatty is the youngest officer of his rank in the British Navy. He is the son of Captain D. L. Beatty, of Wexford, county Wexford, a member of a well-known Irish family. At the age of thirteen he learnt his business, as a cadet; twenty-one saw him a Lieutenant. In 1908 Lord Kitchener's expedition to Khartoum, in which he was employed, brought out those qualities of high courage and reliability which have served him and his country so well. At twenty-seven he was promoted to the rank of commander. The Boxer trouble (1900) afforded another chance for distinction. An engagement took place at Tientsin in June of that year, and the young commander was twice wounded. For his service and gallantry on this occasion he was made a captain. The reputation of the "youngest officer of his rank" has followed him throughout his career.

PEACE SOUVENIR.

PRESIDENT WILSON.

SILENCE is not always associated with strength, but the two are admirably blended in Franklin Woodrow Wilson, one of the few great leaders of men that the war has bequeathed. Less than a decade ago he was practically unknown on this side of the Atlantic, and even in his own country he was regarded more as a learned academician than as a man who would "cut much ice" (the use of American phrase) in the affairs of the world. The war has opportunity. Many people blamed him for what appeared to be the long delay of the United States in "coming in," but when the American nation did come in at President Wilson's bidding, it came hasty, enthusiastic, well equipped—and undeterred. There was no mistaking its driving force. President Wilson is a happy combination of personal influence. In youth a grandfatherly Irishman from County Down, and the son of a Presbyterian minister and a lady who came from Carlisle, and when he was in England he made a point of visiting some of the places associated with his forebears. He has been compared to Lincoln in his calm and cautiousness, in his deep earnestness, and in the clarity of his vision. From the first, President Wilson has had the movement for the world's civilization, and he realized as few European statesmen were able to do that war must vanish from the earth if the world was to be made safe for democracy. His answers to Germany and Austria were plain and forceful, and free from any of the ambiguity in which the older diplomacy delights. The Central Powers always knew what that very polite gentleman at Washington meant, although it suited their book to pretend ignorance. His most famous pronouncement was the speech in which he enunciated his "fourteen points," which include open diplomatic negotiations, and finally the League

the abandonment of economic policies by nations. That President Wilson is a great democrat is plain; as a leader, great, indeed, I am inclined to believe that I am speaking for the silent mass of men, and every where, who have had no place or opportunity to speak their real hearts out. And the silent mass of mankind in the world feels that he is speaking for them. They want peace of the right sort more than anything in the world. Towards the attainment of the League of Nations he has labored long while the war was in progress, and he has labored more strenuously while the Peace Conference has been sitting in Paris. The League of Nations is the hope of a world weary of war. It is designed to make war in the future impossible. "Force vanquished," said President Wilson dramatically when he gave the first draft of the League Covenant at the Peace Conference in February. "Force is vanquished." Can that be possible? After all, centuries of war and bloodshed, can it be that nations will really find other means than arms for the settlement of quarrels? Is it possible that a few chosen representatives of each nation, meeting round a conference table, will be able to talk the matter out and come to a decision which, if the world went on in the old way, would involve disaster, ruin, and death, and the loss of millions of lives, and the wasting of untold treasure? Well, President Wilson thinks these things may be, and must be so; and in every broad-minded people look to him as their leader in the fight against war. If the League should ever come to pass, it will owe its existence largely to the sagacious Professor whom the American nation called to be its ruler in the great hour of its destiny.

MAKING WAR IMPOSSIBLE: LEAGUE OF NATIONS COVENANT.

THE following is a summary of the revised text of the League of Nations Covenant, which was adopted by the Peace Conference in Paris on April 28:

Article 1.—Admission to the League of States not signatories to the covenant requires the assent of not less than two-thirds of the States represented, and shall be limited to fully self-governing countries, including Dominions and Colonies.

Article 2.—Action shall be effected through meetings of a body of delegates, an Executive Council, and a permanent International Secretariat.

Article 3.—Meetings shall be held at stated intervals and as occasion may require. Each of the parties shall have one vote, but may have not more than three representatives.

Article 4.—The Executive Council shall consist of representatives of the United States, British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, with representatives of four other States.

Article 5.—All matters of procedure may be decided by a majority of the States.

The first meeting shall be summoned by the President of the United States of America.

Article 6.—The permanent secretariat of the League shall be established at Geneva.

Article 7.—Representatives of the parties and officials of the League shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

Article 8.—The parties recognize the principle that the maintenance of peace will require the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety.

Article 9.—A permanent commission shall be constituted to advise the Council on military and naval questions generally.

Article 10.—The parties undertake to preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the League.

Article 11.—Any war or threat of war is a matter of concern to the League, and the parties reserve the right to take action to safeguard the peace of nations.

Article 12.—Should disputes arise which cannot be adjusted by diplomacy, they will in no case resort to war without previously submitting the questions and matters involved either to arbitration or to inquiry by the Executive Council and until three months afterwards, and they will not even then resort to war against a member of the League which complies with the award.

Article 13.—The parties agree that whenever any dispute or difficulty shall arise between them, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

Article 14.—The Executive Council shall formulate plans for the establishment of a permanent Court of International Justice.

Article 15.—If there should arise between States members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture which is not submitted to arbitration as above, the parties agree that they will refer the matter to the Executive Council.

Article 16.—Should any of the parties break or disregard its covenants under Article 12, it shall thereby ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all the other members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to submit it to the justice of all trade or financial relations, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State.

PEACE SOUVENIR.

It shall be the duty of the Executive Council to recommend what effective military or naval force the members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League.

The parties agree that they will support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken, and that they will support one another in resisting any measures aimed at use of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will afford passage through their territory to the forces of any contracting party who are co-operating to protect the covenants of the League.

Article 13.—In the event of disputes between States not members of the League, they shall be invited to accept the obligation of membership for the purpose of such dispute on such conditions as the Executive Council may deem just.

In the event of a Power so invited refusing to accept the obligations of membership in the League, and taking action against a State member of the League, the provisions of Article 16 shall be applicable.

If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League, the Executive Council may take such action and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

Article 18.—All treaties made shall be registered and published.

Article 19.—Right of delegates to advise the revision of treaties.

Article 20.—Parties agree that the present covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly engage that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

Any Powers who have undertaken obligations inconsistent with the terms of this covenant shall take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

Article 21.—Nothing in this Covenant shall affect international engagements such as treaties of arbitration or the Monroe Doctrine.

Article 22.—To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them, and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to rule by themselves, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in the constitution of the League.

The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the League.

In every case of mandate, the mandatory State shall render to the League an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory State shall, if not previously agreed upon by the parties in each case, be explicitly defined by the Executive Council in a special Act or Charter.

The parties further agree to establish at the seat of the League a Mandatory Commission to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatory Powers and to assist the League in ensuring the observance of the terms of all mandates.

Article 23.—The parties will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour, and agree to establish as part of the organization of the League a permanent Bureau of Labour.

Article 24.—The League to take control of all international bureaux already established by general treaties.

Article 25.—The League agrees to promote the establishment and co-operation of voluntary national Red Cross organizations having as purposes the improvement of health, the prevention of disease and the mitigation of suffering.

Article 26.—Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the Executive Council and by three-fourths of the States whose representatives compose the body of the delegates.

M. CLEMENCEAU.

M. GEORGES CLEMENCEAU, the French Prime Minister, is one of the most outstanding personalities of French political life since the days of Gambetta. He is known as "The Tiger," and despite his seventy-eight years, he looks himself with a vivacity and activity that are always associated with that animal. One may not like M. Clemenceau, but one has to respect him, and take count of what he says and does. Like many other great men whom the crisis in the world's history have found, the French Prime Minister was a long time in discovering his true métier. After qualifying as a doctor he went to the United States, where he became for a time a teacher of French in a ladies' school. When the Republic was proclaimed he returned to Paris, became a Deputy, and by his remarkable course of political boldness found high place in the Government. Twelve years ago he was appointed Minister of the Interior, with an opportunity of proving that he could be as great in policy as he had been in destructive criticism. He was in constant conflict with Labour, quelling the strike agitation that followed on the Lens disaster, and fighting the Government servants in their claim to combination. The agitation among the wine-growers of the south was firmly handled. In his bowler hat and tweed suit M. Clemenceau entered the cottages of the disaffected men, spoke individually to their ring-leaders, and confounded them by a combination of a show of force and the use of diplomacy. The effervescence was checked when the leader of the men walked into his office at the Place Beauvais, and in a foolish moment allowed himself to receive one hundred francs from the Premier to return home. The power of the champion was broken and he was heard of no more. When M. Clemenceau was not speaking he was writing, and one cannot say whether his speeches or his articles were more dangerous to the enemy.

His paper was L'Homme Libre ("The Free Man"), which he changed to L'Homme Enchaîné ("The Man in Chains"), because it was constantly suppressed by the censor in the early days of the war. His vigorous prosecution of the war is one of the most remarkable achievements in modern French history. Temperament, strong-willed, courageous, his heart has never quailed in the darkest days of the last four years. This old man, at an age when most men, if in public office at all, are only too glad to take things as easily as possible, and to shift the work on to the shoulders of subordinates—this old man worked tremendously, inspiring not only France, but the whole of the Allies, by his majestic courage and volcanic energy. He represented in his own person the indomitable spirit of France. No wonder he was popular, no wonder that Paris adored him, and that when he crossed the Channel for a brief visit Londoners turned out in countless thousands to do him honour. The French troops, whom he loved, loved him, and no soldier to the front was more gladly welcomed. M. Clemenceau is a firm friend of England, so much so that he has been accused of favouring us at the expense of his own country. He is a first-rate horseman, a fine fencer, and the deadliest pistol shot in Paris. The mad youth who recently put a bullet into the back of the aged Premier was taking risks, and stepping in where even an angel of darkness might have feared to tread. An iron frame and an unquenchable spirit enabled him to survive an injury that would have been fatal to many a younger man; and M. Clemenceau, at the age of seventy-eight, lives to fight another day.

GENERAL PERSHING.

GEORGE MELVILLE PERSHING, the Commander-in-Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, is a soldier, every one of his seventy three inches, and youth is one of his leading characteristics—or at least, youthfulness. At a rough guess, but who would say he was about twenty years of age; as a man of truth, he is never stale, and still looks strong. The world on this side of the Atlantic had heard little of him before the present war, but even when he was a cadet at West Point he was known as a lad of highly unusual qualities for the military profession. Quickly he became the senior captain of the cadet corps, the highest honour there, and in other ways indicated that he was no ordinary soldier. On the left breast of his tunic he wears two medals, both silver. One of these is formed of two interlaced letters, "A" and "C", from which are the words, "Expert Rifleman"; the other bears a miniature revolver with the words, "Pistol Expert." These decorations are not lightly won in the United States, where every second man in the Army is a good shot. He has fought with Indians in the West, against the Spanish, or with a Spanish regiment, and against the Moros in the Philippines. The islands, with their swamps and forests and desert places, were intensely difficult for fighting, and the Moros were not exactly cultured in their methods of warfare, but Pershing beat them down, and then turned from soldier to administrator with such success that he achieved a great reputation for fairness and chivalry among his former foes. No doubt his phenomenal promotion from Captain to Brigadier-General in one day was a record, even in these times of rapid rise in command. After the Philippines came Mexico, where "Black Jack," as the soldiers call Pershing, chased Villa, the Mexican bandit chief, through steep and mountainous lands in a fashion which military men fear of leadership. Just before he left with his forces his wife (the daughter of an American senator), and their three children were burned to death in a fire in San Francisco. Even this dreadful calamity was met with stoic calm, for General Pershing is one of the silent men of the earth. But his silence is not silent. From all parts of the country came letters of sympathy—from officers and privates, and from members of civilians, who had come to regard him with admiration and respect. Although a man of few words, General Pershing has a very winning personality. His smile is frank and kindly, and an admirer once said of it that he could discern a band of saints. And the smile did play its part on one occasion in doing that very thing. It was in the Philippines, and he went with Mr. Savage Landor, the famous explorer, to parley with the enemy. Both men were unarmed. General Pershing being convinced that there could be no better way of impressing the Filipinos with the honesty of the intent. The event justified his confidence, for the natives, conquered by the Pershing charm, lay down their arms. A few of General Pershing's sayings are on record. "Voluntary recruitment," he says, "is a relic of military inefficiency," and so he is in favour of compulsory training and service, which among other advantages to his mind, would make the immigrant into America less belligerent. In the war which has just come to a successful close, he has worked splendidly in co-operation with the Generals of the Allied forces, and his thoroughness, given the best of his resources, his indomitable courage, and his thoroughness.

IN THE AIR AND UNDER THE SEA.

ONE of the most remarkable experiences in the war was that of a British stoker-petty officer who escaped in a miraculous manner from one of our submarines which had been sunk in home waters from an accidental cause. Although he was not fighting for his life, he showed a wonderful example of indomitable courage and perseverance, and of refusal to acknowledge defeat. He was alone in almost complete darkness, with the gradually rising water, receiving electric shocks, and towards the end suffering from the effects of chlorine gas and a badly crushed hand, yet in spite of continual disappointments he worked on for nearly two hours, keeping his head to the last, and at length succeeded in escaping.

It was about 10.30 in the morning when the mishap to the submarine occurred, and at at once became apparent that she was taking in a great deal of water. The stoker-petty officer's first impulse was to close the lower conning tower hatch, but this he could not do, as some orders had been ordered up the conning tower so he went off to see if all the men were out of the engine room.

Having satisfied himself that the men had left off he made his way to the conning tower hatch with the intention of closing it, but before he reached it water was pouring in in a mighty volume. That meant that his chances of closing the hatch were small. In general

With the weight of water the hatch began to dip forward, and his only hope of escaping drowning was to shoot himself in the engine room. But before he closed the doors he shouted again to see if there was anyone about who was still alive. Getting no answer he reluctantly closed the doors against the rising water.

BLOWN TO THE SURFACE.

At this time the engine room was in complete darkness save for the glimmer from one point later. The effect of the salt water on the electric batteries was to generate chlorine gas, and the air was becoming overpowering. The water had short-circuited the electric current, so that practically everything he touched gave him a shock. Moreover, the room was oppressively hot.

He tried to think of a means of escape, and conceived the idea of opening the hatch and floating to the surface, but on trying to open the hatch he found that the tremendous pressure of the water outside prevented him moving it. He had always accepted the theory that the pressure inside a sunken air-locked vessel could be greater than the pressure outside. So to increase the pressure inside he opened a valve and admitted more water.

When he considered the pressure was sufficient to blow him out he opened the hatch, but immediately closed it again, as he had insufficient pressure. With his shoulder, and exerting all his strength, he lifted the hatch, but again, with the weight of the water, it slammed to, crushing his fingers. With difficulty he released them, and once more opened the valve and admitted water until the engine room was flooded right up to the coaming of the hatch.

The air in this confined space was under tremendous pressure, greater than that of the water outside, so he was able to open the hatch and rise rapidly to the surface, where he was picked up by a destroyer.

AIRMEN'S THRILLING EXPERIENCE.

The story of a pilot and an observer who spent three days and nights in a stormy sea before being rescued is one of the most thrilling incidents in aerial history.

Lieuts. Jacquot and Nixon, in their seaplane, were engaged on patrol work, hunting for submarines, near the Scillies, shortly before hostilities came to an end, when their machine dropped into the waves.

They managed to clasp to the upturned floats of the submerged plane, and held on through the night.

On the second day, a steamer was sighted, but, thinking that their frantic signals proceeded from a U boat, the captain quickly took his vessel out of sight, glad of a chance to escape from peril, as he thought.

On the third day, the men attracted the attention of a passing cruiser which approached cautiously in a zig-zag course with her guns trained on the supposed submarine. But, when the real identity of the airmen was discovered, oil was poured on the turbulent sea, and a difficult rescue effected.

During their three days' immersion the officers' only rations were a few biscuits, raisins, and malted milk tablets.

AMERICA has at least five national anthems. We have only one, "God Save the King." The French national anthem, "La Marianne," is a song which requires the right atmosphere, and is not suitable for receptions and reunions. It is a song of revolution.

Brother Jonathan, the popular nickname for the United States, arose from the person of Jonathan Trumbull, the Governor of Connecticut, whom General Washington never failed to consult in cases of emergency. He would exclaim: "We must refer this matter to Brother Jonathan when we have difficulties." Uncle Sam, another popular name for America, arose from a vulgar misinterpretation of the letters "U.S." United States. John Bull was derived from Dr. Arbuthnot's satire of the title of a typical Englishman, published in 1722.

Ever since bullets were first used in battle, the number of deaths caused by them has been comparatively small. For instance, during the Franco-Prussian War no fewer than 87,000 projectiles were fired into the little town of Metziers. Not the casualties—deaths caused were less than 300. The British rifle firing in the Boer War was better and more deadly than in any other war, but it was not very deadly even then.

The home of our mountain artillery is in India, on the North-West Frontier. The first mountain gun in use was a ten-pounder. This, though used in action by a battery at Goliagh-puri, was soon to be regarded as obsolete. To-day we have two kinds of mountain guns: 3½ howitzer, firing a 30lb. shell up to 6,000 yards; and a 2½ field effective at 5,400 yards, and firing a shell of 12 pounds.

The French Croix de Guerre has a ribbon of green, crossed by five red stripes. The Croix is the youngest of French decorations, for it was instituted in the spring of 1915, "to commemorate individual mentions in the Daily Orders during the campaign against Germany and her Allies," and it is awarded not only to soldiers but to sailors and civilians. It is also given to nurses who have won a "mention" by their devotion or courage.

An interesting fact concerning the V.C. list is that there have been three cases of father and son both with the distinction. In the Boer War young Lieutenant Roberts repeated his famous parent's heroism by gaining the V.C., and in the late war the late Major W. La Touche Congreve won it about sixteen years after his father, Lieutenant-General Sir W. N. Congreve, K.C.B. The third case is that of the late General Sir Charles, who won the V.C. in 1857-8, and Brigadier-General Sir John Edmund Congreve, who won the decoration in Somaliland in 1886, and lost his life in February, 1896.

On board the ships of our Navy there are confidential columns on wireless signal codes, book-on-gamut and torpedo matters, all of which are kept securely under lock and key. Sometimes it is necessary to destroy a reference book. Two officers then burn the book until it is reduced to ashes. Before destroying it, the number and the title must be accurately recorded and its fate entered in the ship's register.

Japan's name for Japan is Nippon. There are no chairs or tables in the houses. Nearly every man follows the trade of his father. The Japanese Empire includes nearly 4,000 islands. No applause is permitted during the sittings of the Japanese Parliament. The smallest tobacco paper in the world are smoked by the Japanese. It is not considered correct for women to enter a court of justice. They do not use buttons for buttoning, regarding them as ornaments. Ladies who contemplate going to the theatre begin to dress for it the day before.

The red cross as a badge of service for suffering humanity dates back more than three hundred years. Camillus de Lellis was born in Kingdom of Naples in 1509. After serving in the Venetian army, he went to the hospital of San Giacomo in Rome with an affection of the leg. There he was so much impressed by the horrors and filth of what was little better than a pesthouse that he resolved to devote his life to suffering humanity, "to care for the plague-stricken, and to nurse the sick in their own homes."

JOAQUIN MILLER.

The French Chasseurs Alpins, or, as they are more popularly known, "Blue Devils," are one of the most famous regiments of the Republican Army. Their uniform consists of a black coat, blue trousers, and black mackintosh. As a rule they are short of stature, broad of shoulder, with muscles of iron and nerves of steel. "They are," said a French officer recently, "the elite corps of our Army, the most daring, skilful, and doughty fighters we possess, and every man is a seasoned warrior, hard as nails, and bold as a lion. They are, in fact, all specially chosen for their great courage and physical strength."

The Bravest Battle.

THE bravest battle that ever was fought :
Shall I tell you where and when ?

On the maps of the world you will find it not ;
It was fought by the mothers of men.

Nay, not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword or nobler pen ;
Nay, not with eloquent word or thought,
From mouths of wonderful men,

But deep in a walled-up woman's heart —
Of woman that would not yield,
But patiently, silently bore her part —
Lo ! there in that battlefield.

No marshalling troops, no bavouac song ;
No banner to gleam or wave ;
And oh ! these battles they last so long —
From babyhood to the grave !

Yet, faithful still as a bridge of stars,
She fights in her walled-up town —
Fights on and on in the endless wars,
Then silent, unseen—goes down.
